We give to Miss Katharine Tynans new volume of poems, Shamrocks (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co. , London), the privilege of moving the adjournment of this debate, in order that it may have the first word when the discussion opens again next month. DUBLIN ACROSTICS. IN whatever other province of science, art, or literature Ireland may be behind-hand, we confidently claim for her a clear pre-eminence in the department of Double Acrostics; and we ground her claim to this distinction on a particularly elegant little quarto bearing the name which we have prefixed to the present paper. Its history may be given almost in the words of a letter received from one of its authors, Mr. Robert Reeves, Q. C About twenty-three years ago a very clever weekly journal called The Owl was started in London. It was carried on by Lord Wharncliffe and some scholarly friends of his. Though very successful, it was given up after a year or two. Each week the paper contained a double acrostic, a species of puzzle of considerable antiquity, but which had fallen into oblivion till it became fashionable again about this time. The Owl invited solutions of these problems from its readers; and the contest excited much interest even at the Four Courts of Dublin, whence the acrostic mania spread to the Munster and...
