This court is left somewhat in doubt as to the actual position of ap-pellant s counsel on the questions of assumed risk and contributory negligence of the plaintiff. In the brief filed counsel makes the assertion that the case is to be tested by the question as to whether or not plaintiff assumed the risks of the employment, and states that the question of contributory negligence is not in the case. Upon his oral argument to the court he announced that the above statement contained in his brief was not correct, and that he did rely on the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, and the first point he argued to the court was that the complaint in the case did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, because it contained no allegation negating the existence of contributory...
