Not illustrated. 1840 Excerpt: .offered, and erected batteries on the crown of the glacis; several breaches were opened, but as the passage of the ditch had not been effected, owing to the fire of the besieged, they were not deemed very accessible, and Tilly had doubts of the result. Pappenheim's impetuosity overcame his scruples, and a general assault was determined upon; but not before the citizens had been lulled into security by the pretended retreat of the besiegers. On the ninth of May, the fire of the imperial artillery suddenly ceased; the guns were withdrawn from the batteries; an unusual silence prevailed in camp, and every thing indicated that the siege was raised. Count Gualdo, who was present in Tilly's army, informs us, that the imperial adherents in the town helped to render this opinion general; but we should not believe that men, having life and fortune depending on the issue, could have been deceived by so gross an artifice, were we not assured of the fact from undoubted authority. A respectable clergyman, who was saved by the avarice of an imperial officer, tells us himself that he was addressing his congregation and returning thanks for their general deliverance, at the very moment when the enemy were ascending the ramparts. At seven o'clock, on the morning of the 10th of May, the town was attacked at four different points. As the citizens always retired to their houses at day-break, the soldiers only were at their posts; and...
